tion of students and do try to choose the type who will harmonize with the institution's tradition and educational ideals.

On the whole these colleges do not present iron bound requirements. In cases where it is felt that the school would lose by rejecting a not quite adequately prepared student, the regulations are flexible enough to allow deviation. If there were no other indication, the vagueness and the small number of the regulations would tell this. However, as this study has shown, many of these institutions have definite provisions which will allow them to test and process the doubtful as well as the exceptional who may not be fully qualified.

Should this study show nothing else, it shows clearly that the twenty-five Lutheran Church affiliated colleges are aware of their responsibilities to the Church and to American society. They demonstrate this by offering to educate American youth.
